TRUMBULL -- For some people, computer literacy comes as naturally as the ABCs. For others, learning operating systems and software programs is worse than trying to tackle a challenging foreign language like Swahili.

Consider Marilyn Greenberg an interpreter. Greenberg is the owner of the Trumbull-based Monroe Business Associates, an instructor-led computer training company.

"I originally started the business in 1989 in my home, in my basement in Monroe," Greenberg said.

Eleven years later, she moved to an office in Trumbull at 35 Corporate Drive.

Greenberg trains the employees of her corporate clients at their offices or in her private classroom, and gets them up to speed on computer programs. She works with novices and experts.

"No matter what level of student is in the class, she can speak to all levels and she gives each person what they need," said Deborah Cox, Trumbull's economic development director, who has taken a couple of classes from Greenberg.

"She can give the entire spectrum from the basic level to more advanced information and she can adjust the pace all within one group," Cox said.

Information Technology to business majors at Sacred Heart University, said it's important to tailor her classes to all levels.

"People learn differently. Some people can do an online class or read a book. Other people like to see, ask questions, have an instructor there to guide them through the learning process," she said.

Greenberg's training can be ongoing as frequent updates to technology require companies to freshen employees' skills. That means she must stay on top software upgrades for several programs.

"I have clients who are using three different versions of Microsoft Office," said Greenberg. "I really enjoy the faces on people when they realize a piece of software such as (Microsoft) Word and Excel could do something that they didn't realize it could do," Greenberg said.

Cox added that Greenberg's organizational skills are "fabulous." For years, she chaired Trumbull's Pumpkin Run race.
