					Furnish and install 26kW generac whole home stand by generator with automatic transfer switch. Home has a 400 amp under ground service. The Load side of the meter has 2X 200 amp feeders that terminate into separate disconnects. The intent is to remove one 200 amp disconnect that is currently located in the garage, and replace that with a 200 amp transfer switch. The generator will only be powering one 200amp panel and dropping out the second disconnect as it will not be connected to the "Customer Load" terminals in the transfer switch. There are 2X 2inch PVC conduits that are existing that the customer was told the property came with provisions for a remote located stand by generator. We have stuck a snake through both raceways end to end and they are complete, but were not installed by me iv never came across this before please advise how to handle. Can we use the conduits? Existing conduits are ran from just below the meter, under the gravel driveway, and travel another 50 feet to the generator location(based on the length of run and customer information.) If we can use we would need to bring the conduits into the garage where the service panel and disconnect currently reside.Â

						Home currently has a 400 amp underground service to the meter location on the back side of the garage. The feeders then stub into the garage where one terminates into a 200 amp main breaker panel, and where the second feeder terminates into a 200 amp disconnect switch which feeds out to the laundry room breaker panel controlling most of the customers desired loads. The generator conduits come up just under the meter the intent is to stub them into the garage and remove the 200 amp disconnect switch that is feeding out to the laundry room panel, and replace that with a Generac 200 amp automatic transfer switch which will also be equipped with a 200 amp main breaker factory installed.Â
